“SELF ISSUES” IN SUPERVISING TRAUMA WORK

Presenter Profile—DAPHNE HEWSON

Daphne Hewson is a psychologist and narrative therapist. She has been working in psychology for around 40 years, both as an academic (Clinical Psychology and Social Health programs at Macquarie University) and in private practice. Daphne’s focus has been on working with survivors of childhood trauma/abuse. She is passionate about the importance of supervision and promotes it whenever she can, such as supervision workshops for NSW Psychologist Registration Board and for many government and non-government health agencies in Australia and New Zealand.

Presentation Summary

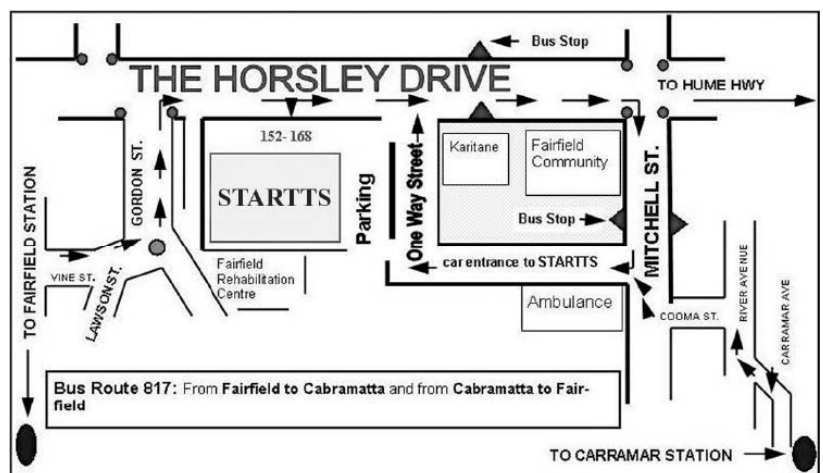

When a counsellor brings their work with a traumatised client to supervision there are three emotional worlds to consider: those of the client, the counselor and the supervisor. Supervision is limited if it focuses only on the client’s emotional experiences. Various processes can evolve in and between the counsellor and supervisor such as transference, countertransference, vicarious traumatization, blunted affect, competitive horror stories, desensitisation and dissociation. In this presentation Daphne will discuss ways in which these critical emotional responses can, and should, be addressed in supervision.
